

Acknowledgments

This work would not have been possible without the love for learning instilled in me by my mother, Anna M. Cullison-Hill. I still hear her motherly directive to me, “Books are your friends!” which she repeated often through out my childhood--an aphorism that I wholeheartedly embraced. Later in life, our discussions occasionally turned to her desire for a college education. There was no question to both of us, had the circumstances of her journey been different, she too would have earned advanced degrees. I had hoped so much that she would live to attend my graduation, however, she passed away during the time of this study. This work is in loving memory of her.

An inventory of those whom I want to thank would occupy many pages. A non-exhaustive list includes Louise Calvin, President of the Palmerton Citizens for a Clean Environment, and members of PCCE, especially Kada Rehrig , Tess Roberts, Ellen Colangelo, Sandy Peters, Linda Holland, Kathy Ozalas, and Ron Monty. Their constant patience, support and willingness to participate was an inspiration to me. Without them, none of this would have been possible. Martin DeSouza passed away during the course of my research. Although I never formally interviewed him, his numerous insights are contained herein.

Special thanks are extended to my companion, James C. Savage, for his unflagging support and encouragement; my father, Joseph A. Hill, Sr., and other family members; my classmates Karen Bowser, Kathleen Seig, and Marion Schultz; and several employment supervisors, especially Mr. John Brosious and Dr. James Grace for their understanding.

I want to recognize the gracious help and influence of several staff and faculty at Penn State University. First, Ms. Ruth Runion-Slear indefatigably located many dozens of library materials that were not available at the Pennsylvania State University Harrisburg Campus. In the course of several years we had a “fax relationship” that virtually enabled the comprehensiveness of this work. Mr. Michael Kalbaugh graciously assisted in telecommunications between University Park and the Harrisburg Campus on critical occasions. Dr. Daniele Flannery had a profound impact on me, and was instrumental in my decision to return to school in the Adult Education Program; genuine thanks go to her.

Finally, I would like to acknowledge: the diligent work of my dissertation committee, Drs. Henry Giroux, Allan Quigley, and Barry Kanpol, and former-PSU Program Chair, Peter Cookson; those individuals who read--and commented upon--all, or part, of this thesis; and especially Dr. Fred Schied. I treasure his critical insights on the study, and the friendship that Jim and I have established with his warm family.